

Abstract

An antimicrobial polymeric coating system comprises core-shell particles, the core comprising nanoscale particles of an inorganic material having a particle size  $< 100$  nm and the shell being formed by at least one substance having an antimicrobial action. Of preferred possibility for use are core-shell particles having a titanium dioxide core and a copper or silver shell. This allows permanent protection against bacteria to be provided.

-----